

Tourism Promotion Tax helps State Historical Society

On Thursday, Jan. 31, Gov. Dennis Daugaard signed House Bill 1066 into law, making the one-half cent gross receipts tax on tourism-related businesses permanent. This is important to the South Dakota State Historical Society because the half-penny tax supports our work in archaeology and the museum.

In the state budget crisis of 2009, a one-half cent tax was added to the existing one-cent tourism promotion tax to cover budget cuts that impacted archaeology, the arts and the tourism challenge promotional program. Two years later, another round of budget cuts was softened by additional funds from the tax being directed to the museum at the South Dakota Cultural Heritage Center.

The State Historical Society operates in five program areas—archaeology, archives, historic preservation, museum, and research and publishing. The State Archaeologist oversees the archaeological research center in Rapid City. The office largely provides archaeological services, such as record searches, surveys, and some excavations for state and federal agencies. However, under state law (SDCL Chapter 1-20) we are also responsible for maintaining confidential site locations and records for nearly 20,000 archaeological sites; approximately 2,000 cubic feet of state archaeological collections; 70,000 catalog records, field and research notes and maps; and 83,000 photographs. Whereas the archaeological services are billed out to the agencies using them, the safeguarding of the archaeological records is a state expense. When the Archaeological Research Center was threatened with closing over these necessary state outlays, the general funds were replaced with support from the half-penny tourism promotion tax.

Two years ago much of state government faced a ten-percent budget cut which would have crippled the State Historical Society. Although the society did take a budget cut, the funding for the museum was switched from general funds to the one-half cent tourism promotion tax. As a result, we are able to

When the State Legislature initiated the half-penny tourism promotion tax, they placed a two-year sunset clause on it, allowing the tax to expire. Prior to its expiration, an effort was made to permanently extend the tax, but the bill got caught up in end-of-the-legislative session politics, and the only way to get the tax extended was to place another sunset clause on it. The tax was set to expire at the end of June this year, and a coalition of tourism, history and arts leaders worked together to permanently keep the tax so the outstanding work that we do can continue.

This time around, the state legislature viewed the first four years of this tax as an experiment which proved highly successful. They saw the promotional work of tourism to be very effective and the contributions of the arts and history as being essential. So by overwhelming majorities, the House of Representatives and the Senate approved the permanent extension of the tax and Governor Dugaard signed the bill, the first measure he signed into law this legislative session.

Thank you for your support and hard work on behalf of the South Dakota State Historical Society and the one-half cent gross receipts tax on tourism related businesses. jdv
